Afterwards, in a journey through Holland, he also made enquiries into the conduct of the crops, and the method of manufacturing it; having obtained admission into their stoves, where he found a management more expensive, but no ways preferable to what is practised by many in England; this he did that he might enter upon the culture himself, with that knowledge of the business which was requisite for avoiding great errors. Ill success in such pursuits, is more often owing to hafly, premature attempts, than to really natural obstructions--It is oftener the moral, than the physical capability that is wanting. During his stay in Holland, he examined their madder grounds with the minutest attention; made every requisite enquiry for gaining as complete a knowledge of the culture as possible--and from thence was convinced of the propriety of attempting it at...
