It is 803 AD in Baghdad in the closing years of the glorious reign of the Caliph Harun al-Rashid best known in the western world as the caliph whose court is described in the Arabian Nights. His reign represented the peak of Abbasid power in a caliphate full of pomp, splendor and learning that is often seen as the golden age of Islamic civilization. Harun al-Rashid was a popular ruler who relied on the Barmakis, the Persian administrators to run the Abbasid Empire. Romance and intrigue provide the central plot of the novel that is woven into the broader picture of the fall of the Barmakis. Chief among the Barmakis was Harun's best friend and vizier, Jafar. Harun held his sister Abbasa in great affection and loved to spend his evenings in her company. But his favorite companion was Jafar. As he explained to Jafar, You see her only in my company, your body never approaches hers and you have no conjugal relations with her. You may thus share our evenings of pleasure without risk. Jafar accepted and swore solemnly never to stay with his young wife alone. The charismatic Jafar controlled many of the levers of power while Abbasa was a strong-willed woman whose beauty was second to none. And the close friendship between Harun and Jafar spawned jealousies among the caliph's entourage. Nor did Zubayda, Harun's favorite Hashemite wife, like Jafar. He had been a tutor to al-Mamun, the son of...
